This text has been six years in the making, and it has seen two of my major international moves, brave and heartbreaking Belarusian protests, a global pandemic, and the start of the Russian full-scale invasion of Ukraine. It is not enough to say that it has been an exhausting, bumpy, and sometimes dusty road. Yet, my colleagues', friends', and family's warm support made it undoubtedly easier.

This study would have not existed if, back in 2015, I have not been encouraged by Olga Sezneva to continue pursuing scholarly research and to apply for doctoral fellowships outside Russia. It was Olga who attracted my attention towards 'beauty' and 'ugliness' as curious, problematic, and sociologically-moving notions. She showed me the city that aroused her own sociological imagination and artistic keenness—Kaliningrad—where we discussed, during our long walks, what brick and concrete have to do with politics. Her caring and X-ray-like readings of my texts, as well as her theoretically challenging questions, awakened in me the wish to think and write in a more nuanced way and to see sociological writing as a way of telling powerful stories. Her passionate interest in the subject reminded me that I have been writing this text for a reason despite the occasional dreadful feeling of isolation during the final years of my PhD trajectory. Olga, time after time, responded to my panicked emails and messages and reassured me that I am not alone in feeling exhausted. To her, I owe heartfelt gratitude that is hard to pack in words for the support and advice that she gave me over these years.

I am also deeply grateful to Giselinde Kuipers. Giselinde not only challenged my thinking regarding foundational concepts in cultural sociology, but she also reassured me that I do have something to contribute to this field of research. Giselinde patiently read and reread multiple drafts that I have been writing over these years, and her frankness and sharpness made my argumentation solid and consistent. Her generosity towards my work and interest in my life showed me that one can be an outstanding scholar while questioning and battling academic hierarchies and the culture of self-exploitation. Together, Olga and Giselinde inspired me to use new research methods, ask counterintuitive questions, and trust my gut when it comes to my future plans and dreams.

This study benefitted from the generous help of over sixty architects, urban planners, city officials, and activists in Wrocław and Klaipėda. I owe very special thanks to Jolanta Banaś who helped me to collect and interpret interviews conducted in Polish, introduced me to the wonderful city of Wrocław, and became my very dear friend. I am deeply grateful to Andželika Rimkuvienė who assisted me at conducting interviews in Lithuanian and who helped me to collect archival materials. Conversation with her not only added depth to my interpretations, but they also supported me in the moments when I felt most lonely. I am grateful to Teresa Przyprawa, Agnė Jocaitė, Roman Urbanowicz, Katarzyna Kajdanek, Marija Snieckute, Liutauras Kraniauskas, and Basia Celebucka for their generous help with transcribing and translating interviews, finding research participants, and interpreting findings. I am endlessly grateful to people in Wrocław and Klaipėda who dedicated their time to my research and who patiently explained to me the intricacies of making architecture 'beautiful' or 'ugly.'

Many people at the AISSR made this research not only possible but also enjoyable. At the Department of Sociology, I would like to dearly thank Olav Velthuis for his confidence in my research and his interest in my experiences at the University of Amsterdam. I owe gratitude to Don Weenink for his willingness to take me on board and teach an undergraduate course 'Sociological theory', which allowed me to develop my own pedagogical style and voice. Thanks to Marguerite van den Berg, I was able to bring my newly found pedagogical style and voice to the area of my own expertise—sociology of architecture—which informed my graduate-level course 'Politics and poetics of urban design.' I am very thankful to students of this course for the scrupulous questions and comments they shared: it was during our conversations that my vision of the political context of urban design crystallized. Several colleagues and friends, in particular, gave me the most valuable support: Michiel Stapper, Fenna Smits, Pinar Sefkatli, Josien Arts, and Yannick Coenders. They read my work, they helped me to improve it, they patiently and caringly listened to my concerns, and they made me laugh when academic life appeared too hard to take. I am wholeheartedly thankful to Jeske de Vries, Gaby Evers, Bashar Alkatrib, and Danny van der Poel for their patience and their knowledge about everyday practicalities of studying and living in the Netherlands. I am deeply thankful to them for every answer they gave to me, because these answers made my stay at the UvA less bumpy.

This research also owes a great debt to my friends and colleagues from other departments, as well as from outside the academia. I am particularly thankful to Annemarie Mol and those people that I met at the Science and Technology Studies Reading Club. I was very fortunate to meet and learn from Annemarie, who showed me that things that appear ordinary have 'secrets' worthy of exploring. Justine Laurent, Tait Mandler, Guillen Torres, and Filippo Bertoni made it fun to experiment with disciplines and genres. During long conversations, walks, and dances with them I understood the value of togetherness in an environment as individualistic as academia. I am dearly thankful to Becky Kazansky for many hours that we spent together outside the office and for her generous support and caring advice in the moments I needed it the most, such as when I moved across the Atlantic Ocean. I am very grateful for our zoom conversations. I am particularly speechless regarding the support that I received from Pinar Sefkatli and Justine Laurent, my paranymphs. Justine and Pinar turned this tiring and stressful process into a light and inspiring one. Justine and Pinar, thank you for being my cheerers, for motivating me to take pride in my work, and for dedicating so much of your time and energy to me! I would love to be your cheerer too.

I am also dearly thankful to Carolyn Birdsall and Linda van de Kamp, who read my articles over and over again and who made me realize that critique and feedback can be kind and soothing. I am deeply grateful to Diana Kurkovsky West, who inspired my interest in the STS in the first place and who advised me on writing cover letters and research proposals over these years. I owe my thanks to Helen Faller for her most insightful, genuine, and caring editing of my texts. I learned from her that academic writing does not need to be dry and boring, and it can be moving and beautiful too. I owe special thanks to Edward Saunders who patiently edited my numerous cover letters and teaching statements.

Critical to keeping me afloat were my friends and colleagues who enthusiastically joined artistic and activist initiatives and who fed my hunger for feminist politics. I have been very lucky to meet Letizia Chiappini so early in my PhD trajectory because with her my academic journey became happier. Her humor and intellect made me believe that the future of academia is feminist and that it would be built upon friendship. Her support and care allowed me to go through the hardest of times, while laughing. For this and many other things I am deeply thankful to her.

I am also deeply grateful to Ying-Tzu (Connie) Lin, who showed me that only public research is worth pursuing, and who always came to the rescue in the moment of crisis. With Letizia and Connie, we dreamt about better futures and we created the collective 'Slutty Urbanism.' I also owe profound thanks to Carolina Frossard, Elisa Fiore, and Sarita Jarmack, whose passion for cities enlivened my sometimes-shaken enthusiasm in research and who were fantastic and supportive collaborators. Nermin Elsherif's, Daria Krivonos', and Anna Woźny's friendships were other sources of energy and hope for me. They helped me to strengthen my arguments and to plan my future research projects while remaining committed to the feminist struggle. They supported me and instilled confidence in me after every rejection letter I received, and they celebrated my successes as their own. It is hard to imagine this journey without my friends Camille Toutain, David Wilkie, Ben Cochrane, Diliara Valeeva, Hammam Anis, and Natalia Maher, whose warmth and optimism about my future made it possible for me to find joy and relaxation during these years.

I owe my sincere gratitude to Geneviève Zubrzycki and Virág Molnár, who responded to my emails and organized my research stays at the University of Michigan and the New School for Social Science Research. They made me feel included and valued in both institutions, and they offered me great advice on writing and finding the right job. Their kindness and dedication made me realize that one day I would like to be of help to other young scholars too. In addition to that, I am also very thankful to the Center for German and European Studies at St. Petersburg and the Herder Institute in Marburg, Germany which supported me intellectually and financially, and whose expertise in archival and comparative research benefitted my research project. I owe special thanks to the Center for Urban History in Lviv, Ukraine, and to Natalia Otrishchenko, in particular. Natalia made my research stay comforting and intellectually stimulating. I think of it with particular warmth, because then and there I discovered the ideal work environment that I wish every graduate student would experience. I am deeply thankful to the International Journal for Urban and Regional Research Foundation for supporting my writing financially, and to Claire Colomb for her kind feminist spirit and for agreeing to write numerous letters of recommendation.

One person, in particular, has been a pillar of support throughout these years. The English language does not offer suitable tools for expressing my gratitude to Liuba Chernysheva. With Liuba by my side, it was less scary to strive for an academic career, because any research project appears non-threatening when we do it together. I am certain that a great deal of my confidence comes from Liuba's support. I am sure that on the occasion anything had happened to me, Liuba would have done a great job at finishing my dissertation. That was our agreement years ago, and since then nothing changed in my vision of our comradery and mutual support. I am deeply thankful to Liuba for believing in me and for travelling with me to both Wrocław and Klaipėda. I owe special thanks to Daria Kholodova, who listened to me for hours and hours and who fought against my self-doubts during these past years too.

I dearly thank my family: my mother Sveta, my father Vova, my stepmother Natasha, and my brother Grisha. I am thankful to them, because they make me feel that they are proud of me, and while I haven't been able to visit home for the past three years, I still feel that we are celebrating this accomplishment together. Thank you, dad, for being convinced I would join "Cambridge or any other big academic institution", even though we had no resources or reasons to believe that this would come true. Thank you, mom, for inspiring me to do what I like and not putting any additional pressure on me. Thank you, Natasha, for discussing with me things beautiful and ugly and for expressing your love towards our 'concrete box' of an apartment. And thank you, Grisha, for asking numerous questions about sociology and my motivation to study it.

Finally, I would like to thank my partner, Roman Hutter, whom I had great luck to have by my side during these past years. Roman reminded me of the value of my work when I doubted it the most, and he expressed an endless curiosity about the subject. I am particularly grateful for his patience. He showed me that work is not everything and that even if it seems I won't be able to finish my dissertation, this impression might not be truthful. He also inspired me to take breaks and take care of myself, and it is because of him that I prioritized my well-being over 'productivity'. His hugs were my medicine.
