My first introduction to Hellenistic poetry was through the Idylls of Theocritus, in a seminar taught by Marietje van Erp Taalman Kip. I immediately fell under the spell of this delicately ironic bucolicist and soon afterwards gladly discovered his contemporaries: fascinating, complex Apollonius, witty, learned Callimachus and the epigrammatists with their tantalizing vignettes. Reading these poets made me wish to write a PhD-thesis in classics, if only to learn more about them.

There was indeed a lot to learn in the process of writing a thesis, more than I had imagined—-and certainly not only concerning Hellenistic poetry. The greatest lesson learned may be that I have only begun to understand how much more there is yet to learn. One of the pleasant things I also found, however, is that though the writing of a thesis may be a solitary and absurdly difficult business at times, it is not something you do all by yourself. Many people have helped me in many ways and it is with pleasure that I acknowledge their support and assistance here. My first and greatest thanks go to my supervisors, Marietje van Erp Taalman Kip and Irene de Jong.

Marietje not only introduced me to Theocritus, but also encouraged me to undertake this project in the first place, helping me draught the original plan for the thesis. Throughout the years she has remained a committed and critical reader of my work. Her dedicated and accurate supervision has saved me from innumerable mistakes while our many discussions over coffee in Café Van Zuylen significantly improved my ideas. Most importantly, her philological rigour was an incentive to do the best I could, while her friendship and sincere encouragement remained a constant support.

Irene proved a keen and critical reader and a helpful and kind supervisor. I have benefited from her enormous scholarly experience combined with common sense. In particular, the structure of my texts was often improved by her incisive remarks. The fact that she has always taken generous time to read my work and discuss it with me, from the first naive draughts to the final painstaking revisions is something I appreciate greatly. Needless to say, all remaining mistakes are entirely my own responsibility. Finally, I am deeply grateful for her confidence in my abilities and the opportunity she has offered me to continue working in an academic environment.
There have been numerous others besides, both institutions and individuals who contributed in some way to the realization of this project. The Institute for History and Culture (ICG) of the University of Amsterdam generously provided the funding. Burcht Pranger, Paul Koopman and the staff of the ICG followed my progress with friendly interest and on numerous occasions lent a helping hand when it came to the more concrete problems of funding etcetera.

The Dutch graduate school for classics OIKOS not only offered an exciting curriculum of courses and excursions but also enabled me to discuss and present my work in a mixed setting of young colleagues and senior scholars. The Master classes in Rome and Athens, as well as the visit to the Annual Meeting of the American Philological Association in icy Montréal were memorable experiences in a scholarly education. Besides being a lot of fun, they taught me important things about the academic world and its sometimes bewildering ways. It is especially Ineke Sluiter, the energetic and inspiring academic director and founder of OIKOS who I wish to thank here for offering me (and many other PhD-students besides) the invaluable opportunities that this graduate school creates.

Numerous good things were the result of OIKOS-activities. One was the “Young Hellenists’ seminar” instigated by Christiaan Caspers, in which Annemarie Ambuehl, Ekaterina Ilyuschechkina, Mark Heerink, André Looijenga, Floris Overduin, Katrin Stoepelkamp, Rolf Strootman, Lina van ’t Wout and myself spent many an hour in animated discussions of each others’ works. Another was the organization of the Athens Masterclass in 2007 with Frederik Bakker, Mariska Leunissen and Caroline Trieschnigg, who besides being a brilliant team also became a group of dear friends.

The Fondation Hardt generously offered three weeks scholarship in idyllic Vandoeuvres with its excellent library. The Amsterdamse Hellenistenclub and the OIKOS-study group “Van Alexandrië tot Rome” have repeatedly lent a critical if willing ear to presentations of my work. In the graduate seminar Oikidion I could discuss my work with younger colleagues.

Some people besides my supervisors have been kind enough to read earlier versions of my work. Martine Cuypers spent a breathless four hours with me revising and greatly improving my first draught for the application for funding in Leiden. Although it was not accepted at the time, it proved very helpful for the later version which was accepted in Amsterdam. Professor Jan Maarten Bremer kindly read and commented on the earliest versions of chapters 2 and 3, besides setting me on the trail of Posidippus, an interest pursued with rewarding results. Gregory Hutchinson took the time to read my synopsis and discuss the ideas underlying my thesis with me over lunch in Exeter College. Annette Harder provided useful comments on an early draught of chapter 1, while René Nünlist meticulously commented on draughts of chapters 1, 2 and 3, offering many suggestions for improvement.

Others helped in other ways: Silvia Barbantani sent me a copy of her article on Hellenistic epigrams which I was unable to obtain through the library of Amsterdam University. Rosa Knorringa agreed to read with me the semi-final versions of various chapters, pointing out to me where the text still needed editing. My colleague Mathieu de Bakker generously offered to take over some of my classes on top of his own busy schedule when the final deadline for the manuscript was rapidly approaching. Rodie Risselada did the same for the organization of the Varia Colleges, when another deadline came in sight, the birth of my dear Julia. To my delighted surprise, the students of the course Greek IB treated me to a delicious apple-pie when I had finally managed to finish the revision of the manuscript.

Then there are the friends I made during these years at University: I have already mentioned many of my OIKOS colleagues who contributed to making academic life agreeable and friendly for me. It was also always a pleasure to find my roommates, in their changing constellations, on entering room 337. Besides our laughs, we shared the grief over the tragic death of our colleague Guus van der Kraan. A small but lasting consolation is the beautiful little book we managed to produce together from the text of his Master’s thesis. Janneke van der Heide discussed the joys and despair of thesis-writing (and much else besides) with me over countless cups of appalling university coffee or nice white wine. It was great to share my fascination with Hellenistic poetry with the students of the Hellenistic reading group. Finally, I am proud that my friends Tessa de Leur and Marije de Bie agreed to be my paranimfen in the defense ceremony. They have always showed their interest and care for my work and well-being in the kindest ways.

My most heartfelt thanks however belong to my family and loved ones: to my dear parents, who have always stimulated me to study the subject I liked, and have encouraged and supported me in many ways through good times and bad. The loving care they have taken of little Julia when I was in the final (and sometimes near-desperate) stages of the writing process is an unforgettable gift.

Finally, it is practically impossible to express what I owe to David. Countless were the inspired hours we spent discussing poetry (or merely some Grand Theory of Everything); many the sunny afternoons, at the side of some river, reading (could you believe it?) Theocritus. If it had not been for your love, encouragement and--justly famous-- enthusiasm, your tolerance, sincere interest and confidence in me at even the most difficult times, I am sure this book would not have been written. It is to you, dimidium animae meae, and to our lovely daughter that I dedicate it.
