ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

There are not many professions in which one’s duties always combine attention to the inscribed worlds of thought and communication and gratitude to those who offer up such records. Yet, the professional work of archivists always involves the writing of thanks. Thus, it is with special pleasure that I begin my acknowledgements, considering this gift of time I have had for working on, and writing, this thesis.

The first inkling for this study began in 2002 in Lund, Sweden, where I was part of the International Council on Archives Committee on Outreach and User Services. For participation in these early thoughts, I thank Christer Bogefeldt, Antonio Lechasseur, Daniela Ferrari, Olga Muzychuk, and Coleman Chua. Antonio, especially, has been a consistent presence in my professional life, building as he was then the National Library and Archives of Canada’s Genealogy Centre.

Following that committee work, I was lucky enough to have a month’s exchange program at the National Library of Scotland. For the chance to pursue some ideas about the importance of genealogical researchers in the United Kingdom, I thank Olive Geddes.

A Research Fellowship grant in 2003 and 2004 from the National Historical Publications and Records Commission (NHPRC) allowed me to develop further some of the ideas learned in these short stays in Sweden and Scotland. I am especially thankful to the NHPRC committee members including Brenda Lawson (Massachusetts Historical Society), Megan Sniffín-Marino and Elizabeth Andrews (MIT), Joan Krizack
(Northeastern University), Kathryn Jacob (Schlesinger Library/Radcliffe Institute), and Mary Ide (WGBH Television). I thank Richard Hollinger, also an NHPRC fellow, who first told me of the possibility of working with the University of Amsterdam.

The fellowship allowed an investigation of websites of interest to genealogical researchers. Genealogist Elizabeth Shown Mills immediately stepped forward and with great generosity sent me her edited volume Professional Genealogy. She also directed me to a number of other readings that I have consulted throughout the years. Also in 2003, I was lucky also to hear François Weil speak of his work and to learn from him about the early history of genealogy in the United States.

In 2005, Hurricane Katrina brought a three weeks’ stay at the Newberry Library in Chicago as a visiting scholar and the chance to see the setting of so much genealogical research. The hurricane also brought a real determination to consider how records about families are counted within people’s lives.

After hurricane recovery, Tulane University offered me a Research Enhancement grant in the winter of 2007. I am grateful to the University for this grant that made possible related work on this project, especially on the private archives of Mary Anne DeBoisblanc and Carolyn Ivy Shimek. Within Tulane’s Newcomb Center for Research on Women, I am also lucky in having supportive colleagues: Nancy Mock, Crystal Kile, Charlotte D’Ooge, and Jessica Gerson. Also on staff, Bea Calvert is a stalwart librarian and Beth Willinger has overseen most of the last twenty years of my professional life, guiding by good example and compassion. Student assistants Stephanie Bordy, Michael Kasper, Catherine Corbett, Ellen Bull, Britt Blevins, and Cortney Benjamin helped in countless ways that extended my thoughts on records.
I also thank the Interlibrary Loan Department at Howard-Tilton Memorial Library, especially Patricia Windham and Hayden Battle, for amazing efforts in amassing so many different sources on family history and album making. I thank too Irene Wainwright from the New Orleans Public Library, Bill Meneray from Howard-Tilton Library Memorial Library, Al Barron from St. Tammany Parish Library, Tim Salls from the New England Historic Genealogical Society, and Katherine Wilkens from the Virginia Historical Society.

Hannah Little at the University of Glasgow proved a wonderful reader and critic of my work. Another reader was Yvonne Loiselle from the Notarial Archives in New Orleans. In the winter of 2006, Yvonne and I began a reading group on archival theory. That so much of our work consisted of reading and discussing my own chapters was a considerable gift.

Through Yvonne, I also learned of the work of Mary Allen Johnson. Her extensive background in editing and computer applications, her magic with table of contents and standardizing formats, as well as her wide knowledge of special collections and much more about archives and libraries, provided just what was needed for my final drafts.

For continuing friendships, I thank proofreaders and neighbors extraordinaire, Cathie Eustis and Rebecca Jordan. For the rare combination of proofreading and trumpet playing, I thank Clive Wilson. I also thank the ever-funny Gabe Mouledoux and the ever-optimistic Debbie Denniston. That I met Myrte Breeman-Homans in Paris in 1971 was one of the most fortuitous events of my life. Through Myrte, I have continued to learn about the Netherlands and through her, this project was made all the more possible, as well. For the chance to stay for a while in their homes, and for their family history and their gezellig ways of including me, I also thank Rein Breeman, Floor Breeman, and Machteld de Nooijer-Breeman.

I owe special gratitude to my promoter Eric Ketelaar. In fact, Eric’s work had nurtured much of my professional career even before I met him. I can remember in 1993 first reading his work and thinking then how his words changed forever the way I saw the study of archives in societies. His guidance and direction over the large subject of family history and records proved even more amazing than this first awareness of his work. Each day in this three-year period from 2006 to 2009 (which was involved also in recovery of whole lives torn asunder by the flood) held for me something that let me move forward. The readings and study, mostly under Eric’s advice, rewarded me with the counterbalance of thought. I could never have attempted this work, also, without the insights that are given in so many of his articles.

Of course, the work itself would not be possible without the many individuals who allowed me to attend their gatherings and ask them questions. Although most of these people are anonymous, their abundant kindness and openhearted willingness to discuss their work touched me deeply. It is not often in life that one gets to learn and to experience the richness of others’ insights. Those who are not anonymous similarly offered this welcoming environment: Mary Anne DeBoisblanc, Suzanne DeBoisblanc Tyler, Carolyn Ivy Shimek, Peggy Jordan, Jonathan Jordan, Meg Jordan Bradley, Mary Lee Baccich, and Lesslie Crowell Rathe gave me a whole new cast of memories and gave their time graciously.
Finally, I thank my smart daughter Franny, my bright stepdaughters Ginny, Maggie and Betsy, and the lovely ones who became also daughters of sorts: Linda Lehmil and Luisa Lancaster. All of you offered such incredible plentitude of lives and ways of being, and at the same time, the chance to see the small, the everyday, and the families of many different types. That I had such a female-inhabited place of living throughout so much of the last thirty years itself gave me even more reasons to think of gender within families and the way that many people share in shaping memories. The combination of life’s various struggles with the chance to consider shopping for dinner or maintaining a home that would nurture you was a privilege. Here in family memory, Richard Coram enters as Franny’s godfather—but so much more, a constant example of bravery and harmony.

Acknowledgements offer both a trail of support and the ethics of reciprocity. The faults here, of course, are all my own, but each of you made possible the chance I had to work. For that chance, I thank you all again for the special place you have made in the universe. That your memories have been shared with my own, I count as very special.
