Acknowledgement

This research project has received a lot of support and encouragement from many individuals and institutions, without which it could not have come to a fruitful conclusion.

I owe my gratitude to my promotor Otto van den Muijzenberg and my co-promotors John Kleinen and Ben White. Otto van den Muijzenberg took great pains in reading the various drafts of this dissertation. His critical comments and thoughtful guidance have been a great source of inspiration every step of the way. For me he is the quintessential scholar/teacher whose boundless patience, unfailing courtesy, and academic thoroughness are the most endearing traits. John Kleinen provided not only the necessary supervision but also offered his friendship and logistical support during my stays in Amsterdam. Ben White's guidance was particularly instrumental in carrying out this research. Working under his supervision, I found myself being driven relentlessly to keep up with the latest developments in child labour studies. In fact, his theoretical approach to such a complex issue has greatly influenced the way my own research was conducted.

I wish to express my warmest thanks to Jan Breman, Mario Rutten and the participants of the promotion club, who took considerable time to discuss various chapters of this dissertation. Without a doubt, their helpful comments made a valuable contribution to the overall improvement of this work.

I would like to thank other members of my promotion committee: Jan Breman, Marcel van der Linden, Olga Nieuwenhuys and Truong Thanh Dam for their willingness to review the entire work. I am also grateful to those who read the manuscript and offered their comments. Olga Nieuwenhuys at the Institute of Development Research Amsterdam (INDRA) who shared with me a common academic interest, commented on several chapters earlier on. Ben Kerkvliet at the Australian National University took time to review the whole thesis and offered valuable suggestions at various stages of the project. Pamela Reynolds at Cape Town University kindly allowed me to share her research experiences and made helpful remarks with regard to my research proposal. My thanks are also due to David Marr at the Australian National University and Martin Grossheim at the University of Passau for their comments on chapter 8, Minna Säävälä at the University of Helsinki and Hele Rydstrom at the University of Linköping for their comments on chapter 7.

This research project was made possible thanks to the financial support from the REAAL bank via the Amsterdam Foundation for International Research on the Exploitation of Working Children (IREWOC) and the Netherlands Foundation for the Advancement of Tropical Research (WOTRO). The Centre for Asian Studies Amsterdam (CASA) and the Amsterdam School for Social Science Research (ASSR) facilitated my fieldwork and more than once provided me with extra funding. I highly appreciate the generous support by Sjef Teuns, Kristoffel Lieten and Meindert Fennema at the IREWOC. I am particularly thankful for the kind assistance by Hans Sonneveld, Jose Komen, Annelies Dijkstra, Albertine van Peursen, Miriam May, Karin Peperkamp, Teun Bijvoet, and others at ASSR. They not only provided me with vital logistical support, but also extended their warm friendship that I shall always remember.

I am indebted to Cao Xuan Tu, for whom these expressions of thanks might sound like hollow words. From the outset, "brother" Tu offered me a hand of friendship and allowed me to share with him a home-away-from-home atmosphere especially during my occasional spells of homesickness. I particularly appreciate the long hours he laboured trying to improve my English with patience and always in good humour.

Among the many persons who gave me support and encouragement over the years, I wish to sincerely thank my professors and colleagues at the University of Hanoi, particularly Phan Huy Le, Phan Dai Doan, Vu Minh Giang, Tran Kim Dinh and Le Van Sinh. My special thanks are also due to Oscar Salemink, Lies van den Muijzenberg, Mieke Schneider, Frieda van Ammers and Melinda Kerkvliet who, in their own quiet ways, gave me constant encouragement and followed my progress with interest.

I must also thank the staffs at the libraries of the University of Amsterdam, of the Institute of Development Research Amsterdam and of the Institute of Social Studies in the Hague for allowing me to exploit their rich sources of information. I also sincerely thank the staffs of the National Archive in Hanoi, of the Library of Hai Hung province and the personnel of various offices in Cam Binh District for providing me valuable sources of references. Particularly, I am grateful to the people of Giao village who wholeheartedly welcomed me into their homes, shared with me the vagaries of their daily life and gave me every facility to conduct my fieldwork.

To my wife Thuy and my daughters Nguyen and Ha, I owe them a personal debt. They have not only shared with me many life's difficulties stoically, but often had to put up with my long absences, allowing me to pursue an academic career with all its pitfalls and uncertainties.

Finally, I must say that while many people have in one way or another contributed to the completion of this dissertation, I am alone responsible for any shortcomings therein.
