This PhD study into the prevention of deadly conflict was a major undertaking that involved many parties around the world. First, I would like to honour four professors, who stood at the cradle of this work. Professor Dr. Cees Hamelink, my supervisor at the Faculteit of Maatschappij en Gedragswetenschappen of the University of Amsterdam, accepted the research proposal from afar and had strong faith in the value of the study and its successful completion from the onset. Dr. Purnaka de Silva, at the time with the UN University, introduced me at the UvA in the fall of 2001 and persuaded me to write this dissertation, making me believe it could be easily done in a year. Dr. Owen Lynch of the John Hopkins University and CIEL in Washington DC, whose committed and cheerful efforts -even briefly from a hospital bed- to acquaint me with the American academic system helped me meet the Harvard fellowship requirements in 2000. Lastly, Dr. Neelan Tiruchelvam, founder of Law and Society Trust, Sri Lankan Member of Parliament and visiting scholar at Harvard Law School, who convinced me over time to further my academic studies on the nexus of rights, deadly conflict and development, but who tragically died in a suicide bomb attack in July 1999, before our academic collaboration could even begin.

At Harvard University, where the literature study was carried out, I thank Steven Bloomfield, Donald Halstead, Tom Murphy and Dr. Kathleen Molony of the Weatherhead Center for International Affairs for their kind assistance during my two years as fellow and associate; Dr. David Little at the Divinity School, Dr. Robert Rotberg at the Kennedy School of Government and Susan Podziba at the Program on Negotiation for their interest in the research; and Elizabeth Olivera at the School of Public Health for her flexible and committed editing of this dissertation, while in the middle of finishing her own PhD. Furthermore, I thank Dr. William Vendley, Dr. Azza Karam and all staff of the World Conference of Religions for Peace in New York for their moral support and for putting up with my special leaves in 2003 and 2004 to complete the field research in Asia, next to my management work. Lastly, I wish to thank the esteemed members of the 'promotiecommissie' at the University of Amsterdam: Prof. Dr. Ton Dietz, Dr. Paul Hoebink, Dr. Marjike Hordijk, Prof. Dr. Gerd Junne and Prof. Dr. Joke Schrijvers.

This study is based on the inputs of countless Asian development experts, officials, academics and community leaders in Cambodia, Sri Lanka, Indonesia and Myanmar. I am most grateful for the time and trust extended by the local NGOs that participated in the research and hope the debates made a little contribution to their work too. I am deeply indebted to fourteen experts, who significantly enriched the field research with their feedback, logistic and moral support, and most of all with their friendship: Thun Saray, Boua Chanthou and Koul Panha in Cambodia; Wimal Fernando, Kingsly Rodrigo, Radhika Coomaraswamy and Asela Bandara in Sri Lanka; Wilarsha Budiharga, Fauzi Abdullah, Nurshabani Katchungtunga and Emmy Hafild in Indonesia; and Aung Htoo, Surapee Chuteracul and Somchal Hamlao in Thailand and on the Burmese border.

Last but not least, I would like to thank Dr. Evelin Lindner and Dr. Nat Colletta, whose insightful comments and kind words of praise on the early drafts were an invaluable source of inspiration that made the three year writing process a little less lonesome. And to honour the unwavering support of my parents, family and friends in Amsterdam, who never tire of my poverty and justice quests around the world, who help keep the Oasis afloat while I work and write in the USA, and who frequently crossed the ocean by phone and plane to keep my spirits up.
