As people repeatedly warned me in the years before beginning my PhD at the Amsterdam School for Cultural Analysis: writing a dissertation is a lonely job. This is definitely the case, but it does not mean one works alone. Many people have been indispensable for this project.

First and foremost, I have to thank my supervisor Sander van Maas. From well before the earliest roots of what became this book, going back all the way to his classes on music aesthetics at the Amsterdam Conservatory more than ten years ago and subsequently to his supervision of my bachelor thesis in 2006, Sander encouraged and challenged my intellectual development like no one else. Over the course of multiple attempts to secure a PhD-position, it was his often relentless, but always fair and encouraging critical commentary that kept me from giving up altogether. Hence, it is no overstatement saying that without his confidence during these earliest stages of the project and his ability to keep me from settling for anything less than the best, this book would not have turned out the way it did. During the past four and a half years, I have often cursed his incredible eye for detail and conceptual rigour, but also thoroughly enjoyed our stimulating intellectual exchange. Having completed this book, I sincerely hope we will continue to have our long conversations and will keep exchanging ideas and music for many years to come.

Next, I want to thank my PhD-colleagues at ASCA for sharing this journey with me and not seldom providing some much needed distraction and comic relief in the form of drinks, parties or a simple coffee. These are of course the people I have shared my office with over the years: Judith Naeff, Mirjam Meißner, Noam Knoller, Thijs Witty, Matt Cornell and Andres Ibarra, but also the rest of the ASCA PhD-family, including Simon Ferdinand, Blandine Joret, Lucy van der Wiel, Melanie Schiller, Annelies Kleinherenbrink, Lara Mazurski, Geli Mademli, Pedram Dibazar, Irene Villaescusa, Jeffrey Pijpers, Eva Sancho, Peyman Amiri, Margaret Tali, Enis Dinc, Selçuk Balamir, Nur Ozgenalp, Asli Ozgen-Tuncer, David Gauthier, Christian Olesen and many others. Of course, at the office, Eloie Kingma and Jantine van Gogh—the heart and soul of ASCA—continue to make PhD-life easier and much more enjoyable for all of us. Outside of Amsterdam, special thanks goes out to Peter McMurray, who was crazy enough to join my idea for an international online reading group, which resulted in a great online resource with input by a magnificent group of international scholars of which I am still very proud. Also, the organisers and participants of the Sound Studies Summer and Winter Schools in 2014 and the Princeton/Weimar Summer School in 2016 offered very inspiring platforms to learn, discuss, try out ideas and meet many interesting people from across the globe.

Although, in the midst of the whole endeavour, it sometimes seems as if the ivory tower of academia is indeed without windows, there was and always is a life outside of these walls that kept me with both feet on the ground. My dear friends in Amsterdam and elsewhere, many of whom I’ve known for over half my life, are like a second family. You know who you are, I would not trade any of you for the world and I could not have finished this book without you. My band members in the now defunct Fata ‘el Moustache’ Morgana and still operative Glice kept me in touch with music as a living, breathing thing instead of just words on paper and offered the sublime outlet of dancing and screaming on stage.

Last but not least, my parents showed me the beauty and power of making and listening to music almost from before I was born and taught me the invaluable lesson to always approach the world with open ears and without prejudice. My big sister initiated me in the world of popular music during my teenage year and has been my role model ever since; I hope we will be sharing music for the rest of our lives. Lastly, there is only one person who has truly dealt with all the ups and downs that went into writing this book, from overtly enthusiastic babbling to completely irrational despair. It is one thing to write a book in four years, it is another to build a life together for twelve years and counting. In the end, being home is the only thing that matters; and I am home wherever you are: the purest signal amidst the noise.
